Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

The current worldwide scenario for people management is full of challenges and uncertainties. As a result of the SARS-CoV-2 public health pandemic, the forms of work organization have changed dramatically and at breakneck speed. Under the threat of the disruption of national health services, successive restrictions were witnessed across the world in general, with governments seeking a balance between public health and operability in national economies. Within the framework of government decisions aimed at protecting public health, people-management measures, restrictions on movement and individual freedoms stand out, which materialized a new reality that is felt at the personal, family and professional levels...
