Message from the Guest Editors

The food system is the foundation of human survival. As the challenges facing the food system become more complex and diversified, especially in terms of more diverse consumer needs and diet structures, food system reform and food safety should be expanded from a single focus on food supply security to a multi-dimensional goal that also considers nutrition, health, environmental sustainability, and social equity.

In recent years, the global food system has come under increasing pressure due to climate change, changing diets, and increasing demands on limited resources from a growing global population. Topics related to sustainable and responsible consumption have received high attention from scholars at home and abroad. Consumer aspirations are also changing, with consumers demanding safe, nutritious, healthy, environmentally friendly, and socially equitable food.

This Special Issue invites researchers to share their work in the form of a major research article or literature review. Researchers are welcome to provide new insights, data, and perspectives on food systems, consumption, and the sustainable development goals, particularly sustainable development goal 12.
