Message from the Guest Editors

Nutritional health may be compromised in patients with gastrointestinal (GI) disorders. It can occur due to inadequate intake, malabsorption of nutrients, loss of protein through the gastrointestinal tract, and increased energy expenditure. We analyze the “causes and consequences of digestive diseases on nutritional status”. In this Special Issue, we will explore the most current and modern management of malnutrition in hospitalized patients with gastrointestinal, hepatic, and biliopancreatic disorders. Nutritional screening and assessment help identify individuals at nutritional risk and guide therapeutic interventions. We will show the tools for a correct nutritional diagnosis in different contexts and the basis of enteral and parenteral nutrition, access devices, formulations, and associated complications with both modalities of nutritional support. Finally, we will give special consideration to the nutritional consequences of different dietary interventions in a wide variety of gastrointestinal conditions, including eosinophilic esophagitis, food allergies and intolerances, gluten-related disorders, inflammatory bowel disease itself, and irritable bowel syndrome.
