Message from the Guest Editor

Polymeric composites are recognized as one of the commonly used material classes in the field of biomaterials owing to the ability to easily fine-tune and enhance their specific properties to fulfil the desired performance required for biomedical applications. Thanks to the easy process of fabricating polymeric materials, people are able to generate many novel types of composite materials for use in the rising field of biomedical application. Of course, the evaluation of their biocompatibility and safety is still the main focus of many researchers, in addition to their preparation.

This Special Issue aims to report on some of current developments in the design, synthesis and application of polymeric composite materials, including cancer treatment, as well as advances in bone or tooth graft materials, targeting drug delivery and/or demonstrating valuable findings in their most relevant applications.
