This Special Issue will bring together different empirical research, conceptualizations, and expertise in multiple and varied forms learning and teaching refugee/(im)migrant communities. It will situate refugees to include those legally designated as refugees by the UNHCR. asylum seekers, internally displaced persons, and migrants who self-identify as refugees to show the complexities and multiplicities of migrant categorizations and experiences. Furthermore, while there is a small, but growing body of research on refugees/(im)migrants' experiences in formal schooling and schooling in refugee camps, this issue will bring much needed attention to educational contexts outside of schooling. While potentially illuminating the challenges of refugee/(im)migrant education, individual pieces will focus on the ways in which these challenges are met, negotiated, resisted, and undone. In the aggregate, the Special Issue will address the broad question: In what ways, with whom, and where do refugee/(im)migrants teach and learn?
