Administrative Strategies and Practices for Economic Growth and Development: Governance, Sustainability, and Digital Transformation in the 21st Century

Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue welcomes theoretical and empirical contributions that investigate how administrative strategies, policies, governance mechanisms and practices contribute to economic performance, in both emerging and developed economies. We are particularly interested in studies that examine how digital technologies, sustainability imperatives, and administrative reforms are reconfiguring state capacity, service delivery, regulatory effectiveness, and policy innovation. We also are interested in evaluating the effects of managerial and entrepreneurial activity, as well as their contribution to achieving the objectives of growth and economic development in the complex context of the 21st century. Here, the role of education, innovations, green technologies and other important determinants of growth and development is to be enhanced. In order to achieve growth and development, we are also interested in comparative studies that determine how economic and social inequalities can be reduced. I look forward to receiving your contributions.
