Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

The identification and quantification of biomarkers are important for the evaluation of animal physiological and clinical responses. Biomarkers should be obtained, whenever possible, from easily accessible, preferably noninvasive, or minimally invasive body fluids. This Special Issue aims to bring together high-quality research, highlighting the importance of the use of biomarkers in animal health and disease. Potential topics include but are not limited to the following: the characterization, applications, and validation of biomarkers; intake biomarkers and dietary preferences; stress biomarkers; prognostic biomarkers in cancer; toxicity biomarkers; biomarkers of inflammation; fertility-associated biomarkers; and acute and chronic disease biomarkers in companion animals. Preference will be given to works related to the study of biomarkers in farm and companion animals, as well as in wild and laboratory/model animals, which address issues related to their biology.
