Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

‘Grazing’ livestock fulfil essential roles in ecology, agriculture, economies, and cultures throughout the world. Not only do livestock provide food wealth but they also deliver ecological services. ‘Grazing’ as an adjective, locates livestock within a particular spatial and temporal pastoral context in which they naturally graze or are grazed. The purpose of this Special Issue and book of Animals is to deal with both the active and passive voices of the verb ‘graze’, exploring the new dynamics of grazing management and practices. Considering ‘dynamics’ as forces and or properties that stimulate change within a system or process, new and advanced thinking, as well as an understanding of grazing on the basis of nutritional and foraging ecology, will allow for a more functional and contextual view of grazing management and the spatiotemporal dynamics and impact of pastoral livestock production on landscapes.
