Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

There is an increasing understanding of cardiovascular disorders in animals because of the utilization of diagnostic facilities by practitioners. Many research studies in cardiovascular research in human and animal models are now looking for new techniques rather than conventional methods of diagnosis for rapid assessment of the heart to enable early detection of heart failure, enhance outcomes, or build up new effective therapeutic strategies. This Special Issue is aimed at gathering recent studies utilizing new diagnosis and treatment techniques concerning cardiovascular medicine in veterinary practice.
