Wildlife Health and Medicine: Ecosystem-Based Approaches to Diagnosis, Treatment and Preventative Care

Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue will consider original articles, case reports, and reviews in the field of integrated wildlife monitoring, as a discipline combining infection dynamics and the ecology of wildlife populations. It will also highlight the functional connection between health data and animal ecology information, including such topics as resource use, social structure, home range, dispersal, and population dynamics. We also welcome studies and case reports on captured individuals or rescued animals and data from wildlife rehabilitation centers, which admit and treat injured and sick wildlife, to understand patterns and impacts of wildlife disease and address the definition of threats to the wildlife–human interface.
