Recent Research on Shellfish Aquaculture and Reproduction –2nd Edition

Message from the Guest Editors

Shellfish are a diverse group of aquatic animals that can be broadly categorized into three main groups: molluscs (Bivalves, Gastropods and Cephalopods), crustaceans (Shrimp, lobsters and crabs) and echinoderms (sea urchins and sea cucumbers). Considering the success of our previous Special Issue, "Recent Research on Shellfish Aquaculture and Reproduction", we are pleased to launch "Recent Research on Shellfish Aquaculture and Reproduction—2nd Edition", which aims to provide a platform for the latest developments in the critical domains of shellfish cultivation and reproductive biology. For this Issue on diverse mollusc, crustacean and echinoderms species, we welcome contributions on innovative farming techniques, closing the life cycle, advances in aquaculture hatchery technology, broodstock husbandry and spawning, shellfish reproductive biology, including physiology, behaviour, and molecular mechanisms, biosecurity measures and sustainable practices, health issues during larval rearing, and advancements in breeding programs. We hope this Special Issue will help to shape the future of sustainable shellfish aquaculture.
