Comparative Genomics and Genetic Diversity in Local Cattle

Message from the Guest Editor

I would like to invite you to contribute to a new research topic in the journal Animals, entitled “Comparative Genomics and Genetic Diversity in Local Cattle”. This topic explores comparative genomics and genetic diversity in cattle breeds, using genomic information to understand genetic variation among different breeds. Research papers should focus on unravelling the unique genomic characteristics that define local and indigenous cattle breeds, seeking insights into traits such as disease resistance, adaptability to specific environments and overall resilience. This research will contribute advancing the understanding of genetic variation among breeds and to enhancing the sustainability and productivity of local cattle populations. I look forward to receiving your contributions.
