Parasites and Wildlife

Message from the Guest Editors

In a changing world, most emerging infectious diseases have been propagated from the wilderness to anthropized areas. Today, research on parasites that may affect the biology and population equilibrium of their hosts is of major interest, especially when a One Health perspective is considered. The present Special Issue aims to provide a collection of comprehensive investigations falling within a number of areas of interest such as epidemiology, diagnosis, emerging zoonoses, food safety, conservation issues, parasite–host interactions, and pathology in infections caused by parasites in wild host species. We cordially invite you to share your recent findings through this Special Issue.
