Innovations in Affordable Housing Design

Message from the Guest Editors

Public housing, intended primarily for low-income populations, constitutes a vast architectural and urban heritage that forms an essential part of contemporary cities. In response to global trends, the domestic habitat necessitates the development of innovative housing solutions from minimal dwellings to co-operative housing. These solutions are necessary for future planning strategies and also countering the obsolescence of existing public housing stock. Architecture and urban planning thus operate in a complementary and interdisciplinary manner, engaging with historical, socioeconomic, political, philosophical, anthropological, and environmental dimensions. Addressing these views enables the development of new housing models that can respond more effectively to the needs, demands, and concerns of society.

We are pleased to invite contributions to this Special Issue, which aims to provide a critical and up-to-date perspective on affordable housing and to contribute to the debate on contemporary alternatives, considering present-day standards of comfort, accessibility, environmental sustainability, evolutionary housing, participatory processes, or the sharing of collective spaces.
