Message from the Guest Editor

Parents play a substantial role in shaping children's emotional and mental health. A positive connection between parent and child facilitates the provision of care by the parent, as well as the maintenance of an affective environment in which the child feels safe to explore, learn, and develop age-appropriate autonomy. We welcome authors to submit diverse and varied perspectives on issues including the role of partners, culture, and non-traditional family structures. Additionally, we have interest in publishing unique study designs which may elucidate causal inferences. Authors are highly encouraged to submit discussions of factors that promote resilience as related to children's mental and emotional well-being.
