

Picturing Morality from Multidisciplinary Perspectives

Guest Editors:

Dr. Chuanjun Liu

School of Public Administration,
Sichuan University, Chengdu
610065, China

Dr. Jiangqun Liao

School of Social Sciences,
Tsinghua University, Beijing
100084, China

Prof. Dr. Yuchang Jin

Department of Psychology,
Sichuan Normal University,
Chengdu 610066, China

Deadline for manuscript submissions:

closed (31 December 2022)

Message from the Guest Editors

Morality is a multi-disciplinary issue that is discussed in many disciplines, including philosophy, ethics, sociology, psychology, management, political science and so on. At the individual level, morality comprises how people master the moral rules as the core of human civilization, form reasonable moral reasoning thinking, cultivate intuitive moral feelings, and carry out social behaviors in line with the requirements of moral norms. At the interpersonal level, morality means harmonious coexistence and positive altruism. From the organizational context level, morality means a positive ethical climate. At the national and social level, morality means the positive development power of society as a whole and means the stability and self-mobility of the social structure. The multidimensional nature of morality determines that it is an important subject concerned by multiple disciplines. Therefore, we welcome theoretical and empirical contributions from different disciplines to open up a multidisciplinary understanding of moral issues.

