

Special Issue

Perspectives on Violence and Sexual Harassment

Message from the Guest Editor

Suggested topics for this Special Issue include, but are not limited to:

- Theoretical contributions from socioneuroscience and cognitive science related to behavioral change towards overcoming violence and sexual harassment;
- Behavioral changes in the community (families, children, students, teachers, educators, workers) promoted by interventions aimed at the prevention of violence and sexual harassment in schools, universities, workplaces, and other social settings;
- Behavioral changes and psychological effects in the process of moving from being a victim to becoming a survivor of violence and sexual harassment;
- The behavioral changes and psychological effects of turning from being a passive bystander in a situation of violence and sexual harassment to being an upstander who stands in support of the victim;
- The psychological effects of being a victim of isolating gender violence and being a direct victim of violence and sexual harassment;
- The dialogic reconstruction of memories in sporadic violent intimate relationships.
