Culturomics: New Interdisciplinary Advances for Research on Culture and Human Sustainable Development

Message from the Guest Editors

The sustainable development of human society faces a series of major challenges, including climate change, disease threats, and armed conflicts—issues that require collective global attention and cooperation. Addressing this issue requires interdisciplinary collaboration and joint efforts across numerous fields, including psychology, etc. In light of these premises, this Special Issue aims to advance the literature on culture and human sustainable development from interdisciplinary perspectives. We therefore welcome both review, meta-analysis, and empirical studies as contributions that explore the following:

- The emergence of cultural norms;
- Cultural structures and dimensions;
- The influence of culture on individual cognition, emotion, attitude and behavior;
- Social and cultural change;
- Applications of large language models in cultural studies;
- Cultural characteristics in future human–AI hybrid societies;
- Novel methods and technologies in cultural research.
