Special Issue

Recent Advances in Neuroscience: Theoretical, Applied, and Experimental Research

Message from the Guest Editor

In this issue, the best of neuroscience is encouraged. "Cutting edge" does not only refer to techniques; new theories spawn new ideas that open up the future. We are soliciting the most advanced ideas and findings in neuroscience, generally speaking and broadly defined. Papers can be reviews of the literature or purely theoretical, but we will give preference to original experimental findings. While modern techniques fit our aims, classic methods with advanced findings are also encouraged. Authors are especially encouaged to submit papers that excite and advance. This issue is the perfect place for both studies that venture outside the typical and research that can move the knowledge base to a new area.
