Traumatic Brain Injury and Disorders of Consciousness

Message from the Guest Editors

The diagnosis and management of disorders of consciousness (DoC) due to acquired severe brain injury remain challenging for clinicians. Important information has been obtained on these issues owing to a bulk of functional neuroimaging, advanced electrophysiology, and clinical studies performed on relatively large samples of patients with prolonged DoC and traumatic brain injury. However, there are still few guidelines available for the management of these very fragile individuals. Therefore, improved and innovative diagnostic paradigms, treatment strategies, and management protocols need to be developed and validated. In this Special Issue, we would like to offer readers the latest experimental researches and overviews on these hot topics.
