Cognitive Impairment Associated with Psychiatric Disorders

Message from the Guest Editors

Cognitive impairment and neuropsychological deficits are prevalent in various psychiatric disorders, and significantly impact patients' quality of life and functional outcomes. Historically, research has focused on understanding these impairments in conditions such as schizophrenia, depression, and bipolar disorder, revealing a complex interplay between cognitive dysfunction and psychiatric symptoms.

This Special Issue aims to consolidate current knowledge and foster new research regarding the cognitive impairments associated with mental disorders. It seeks to explore the underlying neurobiological mechanisms, assess the nature and severity of cognitive impairments, analyze the impact of these deficits on daily functioning, and evaluate innovative therapeutic approaches.
