Cognitive Health in Individuals with Multiple Sclerosis

Message from the Guest Editors

People with Multiple Sclerosis (MS) often experience alterations in their cognitive abilities, including, but not limited to, information processing speed, memory and attention. Cognitive assessment tools, advanced neuroimaging techniques and non-pharmacological interventions are rapidly evolving fields of research aiming to facilitate the management and/or prevention of cognitive decline in the context of MS. This Special Issue of Brain Sciences seeks commentaries, original research, short reports, and reviews focusing on the challenges in detecting, monitoring, and managing cognitive decline in MS. This Special Issue aims to provide information about advances in the research of cognitive assessment and the development of measurements for the early detection of cognitive impairment, neuroimaging and the overall impact of cognitive impairment in MS.
