Special Issue

Migraine and Neurological Disorders

Message from the Guest Editor

Migraine is a primary headache disorder highly prevalent in the general population. Migraine has a constellation of comorbidities, of which the most studied include vascular and psychiatric diseases. However, several neurological disorders, and mostly demyelinating diseases of the central nervous system and epilepsy, can be associated with migraine. Characterizing the comorbidities of migraine and their mechanisms of association can provide useful insights into the pathophysiology of migraine itself and suggestions for treatment in clinical practice. The present Special Issue is dedicated to the neurological comorbidities of migraine, with particular attention of those disorders with potential pathophysiological links to migraine. Both original papers and reviews are welcome.
