

Special Issue

Neuropharmacological Research in Psychiatry

Message from the Guest Editor

In recent years, the proportion of the burden of mental illness on contemporary humanity has increased continuously. A series of mental problems, such as stress, anxiety, and depression, have seriously affected people's normal life and brought psychiatry and mental health into public view. Neuropharmacology is the science that studies the mechanism of drug action for the treatment of neurological diseases, and its main task is to guide the rational clinical use of drugs and develop new drugs according to clinical demand. Thus, the aim of this Special Issue is to explore new drug targets and therapeutic techniques for these psychiatric diseases from pathogenesis. We aim to provide references for neurological drug development. We invite authors to submit review articles or original research articles with a primary focus on the treatment and prevention of relevant neurological disorders.
