New Insights in Psychiatric Disorder Psychopharmacology

Message from the Guest Editors

The development of a plethora of new therapeutic psychopharmacological targets as well as advances in the clinical and research in the field of psychopharmacology has allowed the implementation of new research trajectories and facilitated advances toward a more personalized and patient-tailored psychopharmacology. In this Special Issue, preclinical and clinical studies specifically focusing on new insights and recent advances in psychopharmacology are welcome, including safety, tolerability, efficacy studies, focusing on special populations (e.g., pregnant and/or breastfed women, the elderly, youths) as well as studies coming from the real-world clinical experiences (e.g., case report, case series, and naturalistic observational studies), meta-analyses, and systematic reviews in the field.
