

Special Issue

Heart Failure: Current Trends and Future Directions

Message from the Guest Editor

Heart failure (HF) is a progressive global cardiovascular syndrome associated with high morbidity and mortality and substantial healthcare expenditure. Despite therapeutic advances, HF continues to present heterogeneous clinical phenotypes, complex comorbidity profiles, and significant diagnostic and therapeutic limitations. Rapid scientific progress in molecular cardiology, pharmacotherapy, digital monitoring, and precision medicine is reshaping the contemporary management landscape and opening up new avenues in translational research and future clinical applications. We invite submissions of original research, systematic reviews, and scholarly perspectives for a forthcoming Special Issue entitled “Heart Failure: Current Trends and Future Directions”. We will showcase high-quality scientific contributions that critically examine evolving concepts, emerging therapeutic strategies, and innovative approaches to diagnosis, risk stratification, and long-term management in HF.
