Advances in Diagnosis and Treatment of Colorectal Cancer

Message from the Guest Editor

Colorectal cancer (CRC) is a common gastrointestinal cancer that has a high mortality rate, posing a serious threat to human health. Many CRCs are caused by the malignant transformation of colorectal polyps. Therefore, early diagnosis and treatment are generally considered to be the most effective ways to reduce CRC mortality. This Special Issue aims to improve our knowledge of recent advances in the diagnosis and treatment of CRC. Submissions may include articles reporting on current original research, experimental methodology, and the introduction of new devices and review articles summarizing the current status of biomarkers or images for pathologic diagnosis and management of CRC. I look forward to receiving your contributions.
