Diagnosis and Management of Urologic Disorders

Message from the Guest Editor

Urology represents one of the surgical specialties in which a minimally invasive approach to various pathologies has seen the greatest advances. From a minimally invasive approach to renal stone disease to laparoscopic and robotic surgery for different types of cancers, urologists need to continuously learn to keep up with new discoveries. Continuous medical education represents the key point of this new century. Sharing experiences and challenging situations expressed in well-written manuscripts between medical personnel in this vast specialty represents one of the options available with which to broaden our horizons in terms of new treatment models. This Special Issue invites studies that may broaden the surgical and clinical applications of these most current developments in the field of urology.
