Diagnosis in Obstetrics and Gynecology

Message from the Guest Editor

The field of diagnosis in obstetrics and gynecology has seen significant progress in recent years, including advances in equipment, the emergence of new biochemical and biophysical markers, adoption of new genetic tests, development of new screening algorithms, and even advances in methodology and diagnostic ethics. The aim of this Special Issue is to collect in one place research articles that illustrate and describe this progress in a field as wide as modern obstetrics and gynecology. In this context, we welcome original research and meta-analysis articles covering aspects of all diagnostic modalities (e.g., imaging, markers, genetics) in all fields of obstetrics and gynecology, including fetal and perinatal medicine, gynecological oncology, reproductive medicine and urogynecology.
