Clinical Diagnosis of Otorhinolaryngology

Message from the Guest Editors

Among all cancers, head and neck cancer (HNC) ranks sixth in frequency. Due to the complexity of the head and neck region, HNC might cause many symptoms and clinical signs. The importance of the diagnostics of HNC cannot be over emphasized. With the advent of modern endoscopes, surgical microscopes, advanced imaging, enhanced endoscopy, enhanced contact endoscopy, advances in anesthesiology in recent decades, and artificial intelligence in recent years, diagnostics has made an important advancement. All these improvements lead to a more thorough delineation of the extension of cancer and adequate planning of therapy. Nevertheless, they serve our patients the most, after all. Authors are kindly invited and encouraged to upload their original manuscripts about their experiences and research in the field of diagnostics in otorhinolaryngology in regard to HNC for this Special Issue of Diagnostics.
