

Special Issue

Cervical Cancer Screening, Management, and Prevention

Message from the Guest Editor

In this Special Issue, we would like to focus on selected patients suffering from forms of cervical cancer that are characterized by the dynamics of increased progression. Among cervical cancer patients, those with increased disease progression can be seen in everyday practice. Consequently, the cause of this dynamic progression has become a subject of interest for researchers. These individuals often do not receive adequate therapy, although recommendations for the treatment of cervical cancer patients are precise and widely accessible. Furthermore, such patients have a higher risk of early relapse and an overall worse prognosis.
