Diagnosis, Management, and Advances in Research on ENT Diseases

Message from the Guest Editors

ENT has the privilege of dealing with an extremely interesting body area with a complex anatomical structure and function. It is a wide specialty where the rapid progress in diagnosis, treatment and management can be observed in rhinology, otology as well as upper aerodigestive tract disorders. Additionally, ENT continues progress in the diagnosis and therapy of head and neck cancers, and participates in the development of more and more effective methods of diagnosing and treating sleep breathing disorders. The primary goal of this Special Issue is to advance the knowledge of ENT scientific progress and achievements. We invite all researchers who could contribute to this issue in a form of systematic reviews, original research or short communications, as well as case reports.
