Miniaturized Technologies for Point-of-Care

Message from the Guest Editor

The technologies used in point-of-care settings such as clinics, hospitals, and medical centers play a vital role in delivering quality healthcare at an affordable cost. Recent developments in lab-on-a-chip technologies have a great potential to address the critical limitations in the technologies needed in the point-of-care. This Special Issue is dedicated to technical papers that address some of the current barriers. Authors should clearly identify the technical problem that they are addressing, as well as its significance. Appropriate articles to this Issue will be basic proof-of-concept studies that could lead to the development of novel miniaturized capabilities in point-of-care, or studies related to the translation of developed technologies towards point-of-care applications.
