Special Issue

Advances for Pulmonary Functional Imaging

Message from the Guest Editor

During the last few decades, computed tomography (CT), magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), nuclear medicine, and computer-aided diagnosis (CAD) including artificial intelligence (AI) are continuously progressed in the Radiology field, providing new information in routine clinical practice, and answered various academic or clinical questions. In addition, pulmonary functional imaging has continuously progressed and tried to be clinically set for assessing not only lung parenchyma diseases but also thoracic oncologic diseases. In this situation, this special issue of Diagnostics is planned for providing information about state-of-the-art pulmonary functional imaging with CT and MRI as well as quantitative analysis using CAD or AI.
