Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Over the past two decades, the financial sector has emerged spectacularly and financial innovations have been developed at a spectacular rate. In advanced countries, various financial reforms have been implemented and they have shown their effectiveness in bolstering economic growth. However, in some developing countries, the banking sector is still under-developed and it is still suffering from some anomalies. Therefore, it appears that one of the solutions that help in promoting economic development is the implementation of efficient financial reforms. The aim of this Special Issue is to show how financial reforms have been successful in stimulating economic development in some countries around the world, using single country studies or a panel of countries.
