

Special Issue

Macroeconomics of the Labour Market

Message from the Guest Editor

Economies invites researchers and scholars to submit their work to a Special Issue entitled “Macroeconomics of the Labour Market”. Some of the topics that this Special Issue may include, but is not limited to, are business cycles and unemployment, labour market frictions, labour productivity and economic growth, the impact of technological change on employment and job polarisation, wage rigidities and unemployment, macroeconomic policies effects on the labour market, demographic trends and labour population ageing, flexibilization and job insecurity, the impact of economic crises and labour market resilience. The papers can be theoretical or empirical, and different approaches are welcomed.
