

Special Issue

Migration and Economic Development

Message from the Guest Editor

Because of many factors, including trade, rising inequality, increase in connectivity, demographic imbalances, climate change and political issues, the number of migrants is likely going to keep on increasing all over the world. Hence, this Special Issue tries to offer new insights on the link between migration and development. Economies invites papers dealing with this topic from a variety of perspectives. These can adopt either host or sending country viewpoint, or a more global one. Both short-term and long-term migration papers are also welcome. Studies dealing with illegal migration and the refugee migratory processes would be appreciated. Authors are invited to address one of a range of potential research topics. The aim of the Special Issue is to bring together cutting-edge research papers, both theoretical and empirical, devoted to the analysis of the effects of migration on:

- Well-being, income, inequality or convergence
- Poverty
- Employment and wages
- Human capital
- Social networks
- Diaspora externalities
- Remittances
- Brain drain
- Technological and demographic change
- Trade or FDI
- Entrepreneurship
- Public accounts
