Higher Education and Creativity: International Perspectives on Stimulating Student Engagement

Message from the Guest Editor

The purpose of this Special Issue is to provide scholars with a 'safe creative space' to report on and discuss approaches and practices in which creativity has/could be used in engaging ways to stimulate new thinking, energise professional practice and situated learning, and inspire researchers, instructors, and students at the university level. Scholars are invited to submit empirical or theoretical papers, along with opinion pieces, that focus on innovative and stimulating ways of engaging students as part of the tertiary learner experience, these being influenced by practices advocated/implemented at an operational, tactical, and/or strategic level, and at varying levels of student study (undergraduate, postgraduate, and doctoral).
