Automated Framework for Access Control Systems

Message from the Guest Editors

The trustworthiness of (personal) data is becoming a stringent need for industrial and research products and solutions. In this context, access control systems are fundamental building blocks for guaranteeing the cybersecurity properties of systems, ecosystems, and systems of systems. They are the key mechanisms for managing (personal) data and resources access and guaranteeing their privacy and confidentiality, as well as the lawfulness of their processing. The aim of this Special Issue is to gather the latest research and industrial results concerning theories, methodologies, techniques, and new solutions in the access control domain. Researchers, experts, and scholars from both industry and academia are encouraged to present their recent achievements, joint collaborations, and research directions in this area.
