Recent Advances in 3D Display and Optical Imaging

Message from the Guest Editor

Three-dimensional (3D) optical imaging and 3D displays have been researched extensively for various applications such as commerce, entertainment, medicine, aerospace, manufacturing, robotics, education, security, and defense. The capabilities provided by advances in 3D imaging and 3D displays have substantially enhanced the status of these disciplines, enabling new measurements, detection, visualization, and display abilities that would not have been otherwise possible. This Special Issue will focus on the latest research achievements in stereographic displays, holographic displays, volumetric displays, and integrated imaging displays. Research on integral imaging, holography, photoacoustic imaging optic-acoustic fusion theories, 3D aerial photography, autostereoscopic 3D display, novel optic-acoustic sensors and equipment, radar imaging, medical imaging, special applications, and imaging technologies are welcome.
