Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Seafood is considered to be an important part of a balanced diet because it can provide us with essential nutrients, including proteins, unsaturated fatty acids, and minerals. However, problems continue to emerge due to the rapidly increased processing, preservation, and consumption of seafood all around the world. Significant research is still needed to promote the processing and preservation progress of seafood, developing high-quality seafood products. The relationship of seafood nutrition and health still attracts a lot of interest among researchers and consumers. To maintain a healthy seafood industry and obtain a better understanding of the processing and safety of seafood, we are launching this Special Issue. All studies related to these topics are welcome.
