

Special Issue

Food Intolerances, Allergies, and Celiac Disease

Message from the Guest Editors

Daily food is a basis for human life, but some foods can cause allergy, intolerance, or celiac disease for certain people while being harmless for others. In recent years, although food allergen labeling has been applied in many countries, there is still a high frequency of food-induced discomforts due to accidental exposure.

Worsening this situation, there is no approved treatment for these discomforts. In this regard, any studies on food allergy, intolerance, or celiac disease, either from food science, food chemistry, food processing, food toxicology, or other related fields, which aim to make a contribution to food safety, are welcomed for this Special Issue. Moreover, we hope this special issue will focus on gastrointestinal disorders related to food intolerances, allergies, and celiac disease.
