Message from the Guest Editors

Restoration of forest landscapes has moved from a small niche within natural management to a dominant activity for biodiversity conservation and improving human wellbeing across the globe. With ambitious global targets for forest restoration, there is need for additional guidance on the concept of forest landscape restoration, planning and prioritizing restoration activities, standards against which restoration achievements can be assessed, and policies and governance structures that encourage consideration of biodiversity from the local to the international level. This Special Issue is designed to clarify the concept of forest landscape restoration and to provide information relevant to achieving global targets and improving biodiversity outcomes. Research articles can focus on any aspect of forest landscape restoration, but must be broadly applicable.
