Advances in Forest Restoration and Applied Conservation: Bridging Science and Practice

Message from the Guest Editors

Forests worldwide face unprecedented challenges, including climate change, habitat degradation, and biodiversity loss, emphasizing the urgent need for effective restoration and conservation strategies. In response to global initiatives like the UN Decade on Ecosystem Restoration, researchers and practitioners are advancing innovative solutions to restore forest ecosystems and enhance their resilience. This Special Issue aims to highlight cutting-edge research and applied practices in forest restoration and conservation. We welcome contributions that address theoretical frameworks, empirical studies, and practical applications across diverse forest ecosystems, from tropical to boreal regions. Submissions may include experimental studies, meta-analyses, policy assessments, and interdisciplinary approaches that explore the intersection of ecological restoration, biodiversity conservation, and sustainable forest management.
