Body-Land Relationships

Message from the Guest Editors

Authors should analyze Indigenous struggles and Indigenous feminist practices, highlighting how embodied knowledges and practices of bringing bodies together may enable us to building otherwise futures and relationships. Authors should also examine how interconnected forms of accumulation and distinctive forms of violence may assist us in theorizing Black people as being dispossessed and having a distinctive relationship to Indigenous land. Within Indigenous feminist examinations of the violence of colonization, Indigenous women's political campaigns and struggles contend with the specific ways in which Indigenous women. Two Spirit, and trans people are reclaiming the body as source of pleasure, dreams, and futures. Authors should also examine how ongoing modes of accumulation in the global South and the North may be interconnected, providing an urgently needed internationalist perspective. At the same time, the convergence and divergence of experiences, contexts, and Indigenous place-based and Black political practices will provide insights into otherwise futures. These insights will reveal the structural forces that these communities confront transnationally.

About the Journal

Message from the Editorial Board

Genealogy is a scholarly journal that provides a venue for academic, cutting-edge contributions to the interdisciplinary field of genealogy studies. We welcome contributions that examine genealogies of family lineage, use genealogical considerations and methods in examining other historical processes (including migration histories, personal, social, and national identities, and social institutions) or study the construction of genealogical narratives. The journal is also interested in biographical studies and their contribution to the understanding of broader social and historical phenomena.
