

Special Issue

Health Promotion Effectiveness in Prisons: Proposal of New Organizational Models, Clinical Practice and Forensic Considerations

Message from the Guest Editors

Health protection in prison and secure settings is a continuing challenge in public health, requiring evidenced-based approaches in political and sociological debates at a global level. Given the importance of the topic, the journal Healthcare is launching a Special Issue focusing and discussing all aspects of this complex topic, collecting original investigations, case series and case reports, and reviews in all branches of medicine, clinical and forensic toxicology, pharmacology, psychiatry, rehabilitation, forensic medicine, forensic pathology and criminology. This Special Issue aims mainly to provide an overview of the research paths on health in prisons and secure settings, including emerging perspectives such as gender, precision medicine and AI interface as potential implementation strategies in such settings. Similar submissions dealing with clinical and forensic aspects of other sciences and social sciences are also welcome, as are submissions relating scientifically sound emerging science disciplines.
