Health Education and Promotion in the Community

Message from the Guest Editor

In today's global situation, health promotion is particularly important to our life because of the increasing trend of non-communicable diseases worldwide, the global COVID-19 pandemic, the outbreak of Monkeypox, as well as the natural disasters and other crises occurring in many corners of the world. Previous evidence and experiences have accumulated about the importance of health promotion as a comprehensive and cost-effective strategy primed to respond adequately to these public emergencies. We welcome all types of manuscripts, such as original research papers, systematic reviews, scoping reviews, comments, letters, case reports, et al. The studies could include but are not limited to: (1) special health promotion strategies in improving health outcomes in community setting; (2) conceptual framework/model development about health promotion; (3) health needs assessment of target population in the community; (4) community engagement/empowerment evaluation and improvement; (5) community capacity building; (6) health promotion for typical public-health issues (e.g., COVID-19 vaccination).
