Prisoner Health

Message from the Guest Editor

Prisoners' health is a discipline with cross-disciplinary and interdisciplinary development, combining multiple competencies of family medicine, internal medicine, geriatrics, pneumology, cardiology, physiotherapy and rehabilitation, psychology, criminology, and legal medicine; it requires a comprehensive and strategic approach aimed at prevention and screenings.

Given the significance of this topic, this Special Issue explores all aspects of this complex topic, collecting original investigations, case series and reports, and reviews in all branches of medicine, clinical toxicology, pharmacology, psychiatry, rehabilitation, legal medicine, and criminology.

This Special Issue primarily aims to provide an overview of health research pathways in prisons and protected environments, including emerging perspectives such as gender, precision medicine, and AI interface as potential implementation strategies in such environments. Similar contributions dealing with clinical and forensic aspects of other sciences and social sciences, as well as contributions related to valuable emerging scientific disciplines, are also welcome.

I look forward to receiving your contributions.
