

Special Issue

Physician–Patient Communication, Nursing and Health Outcomes

Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue aims to present research that is focused on theoretical settings of communication knowledge and skills and to exchange the personal professional communication experiences of physicians, nurses, and other healthcare workers in real situations, thus contributing to better relations with patients. Providing information to a patient and encouraging them to actively participate in their treatment gives them a sense of control over the situation and their condition, with the ultimate goal of obtaining the highest possible level of healthcare outcomes.
