Oral Health and Quality of Life in Older People

Message from the Guest Editor

It is my pleasure to introduce a series of original and review articles on the recent advances in basic and clinical sciences impacting oral health in older people. In the last couple of decades, there has been an explosion in the literature linking poor oral health and systemic health conditions, with evidence pointing toward potentially bidirectional causative associations between dental decay and/or periodontal diseases with respiratory illness, cardiovascular diseases and stroke, diabetes, cancer, arthritis, adverse pregnancy outcomes, and more recently, cognitive decline and dementia risk. This Special Issue of Healthcare focuses on recent innovations in the use of telehealth (teledentistry) and silver fluoride therapies to assess and address oral disease in the elderly and infirm, as well as reviewing recent literature on oral health and quality of life in older people.
